FALL PSI INTERNS

By Allison Kurz

Summer 2013 Intern

The School of Communication Studies welcomes its new PSI Student Interns for the Fall 2013 Semester:

Karen Angiulo, Rachel Belack, Kaitlyn Fridley and Kyle Jones. The PSI (Personalized System of Instruction) Internship provides an opportunity for interns to assist with an Introduction to Human Communication (COMM 15000) course and provide personalized attention to these students' learning needs.

Angiulo is a junior majoring in Applied Communication Studies and minoring in Interpersonal Communications and Digital Sciences. She chose to study communication because it matches perfectly with her personality. Angiulo loves learning how and why people communicate the way that they do.

Angiulo's goals throughout her internship are to work very hard and diligently so the students can receive the best experience that they can. Angiulo feels that this class is very important for students so she wants to make it "a great and substantial learning experience for everyone." After her internship she plans to utilize the skills that she has gained to become a better communication specialist.

Belack is a junior majoring in Organizational Communication and double minoring in Business Management and Interpersonal Communication. She chose to major in communication because "she loves interacting with people and realizes great interpersonal skills are some of the best assets to have to stand out in a competitive work place."

Belack hopes to encourage her students to push past their uneasiness and anxiety that they may experience in regards to public speaking. Belack's main goal is to help students succeed by promoting adequate planning and practicing their speeches. After her internship, Belack hopes to continue to search for opportunities that will help broaden her communication skills through hands-on experience.

Fridley is a senior majoring in Organizational Communication and minoring in Political Science. Fridley chose communication as her concentration because she feels communication skills are critical in the modern day work force. Throughout her internship, Fridley hopes to connect with students as well as develop her own mentoring skills along the way. After her internship, Fridley hopes to take the skills she has acquired and apply them throughout graduate school and eventually her future career.

Jones is a senior majoring in Public Communication and minoring in Interpersonal Communications. Jones chose a communication major because he feels that there is always room for improvement to this vital skillset. Now in his second semester as a PSI intern, Jones wants to continue to mentor and assist the students throughout the class. He hopes to provide them with his own knowledge of why they should take an interest in public speaking. Jones plans to take the skills and knowledge he has learned and apply them when he becomes a graduate student and eventually a graduate teaching assistant after he graduates in August 2014.
