Curriculum Development

Global Communication

I created the concentration of global communication in the master's program. This was accomplished by conducting an environmental scan to understand the existing global communication programs in the nation, identifying the strengths of our program in terms of expertise available, collaborating with several departments/units (i.e., Public Health, Political Science, Business Administration, Sociology, Journalism and Mass Communication, Visual Communication Design) to identify and include courses offered by these units that have global components.

MA/MBA Dual Degree Program

I worked with the Dean and the graduate coordinator of the College of Business Administration to create a dual-degree and identify courses from both units that would meet the demands of a global market, decide the administration criteria, and craft the marketing materials.

Graduation Options

I created three additional graduation options for M.A. degree (i.e., coursework-only, project, and internship), in addition to the thesis option to reflect the intersection of theory and application of our discipline, and the variety of career goals our MA students and prospective students had expressed. This included conducting an extensive review of the various graduation options offered in the communication studies MA programs, creating the descriptions and the processes of choosing each graduation option, and creating preliminary evaluation forms for these additional graduation options.

Global Exchange Scholar Program with Catholic University of Portugal

I worked with the then chair of the School of Human Sciences, Nelson Ribeiro (now Dean of the School of Human Sciences) of Catholic University of Lisbon, Portugal to create the exchange program. This included a visit to the Catholic University of Portugal to meet with Dr. Ribeiro and other faculty and staff to discuss the details and a visit to the international student dormitory recommended for our students to stay.
